Magna Carta Gives Irish Fishermen Right to Angle

Dublin — AP — Irishmen take their fishing seriously.

So seriously that the Dublin high court was asked to decide whether 80 Donegal fishermen had the right to wet their lines in a three-mile tributary of the Lough Foyle, the river which runs through Northern Ireland and Eire.

The Irish Society, founded 335 years ago by King James I to administer crown estates in Ulster, claimed it owned the fishing rights under royal charters received in 1613 and 1632. Hundreds of documents, many dating from the 13th century, were introduced.

For 48 days the court hearing droned on. Costs were estimated at 200,000 pounds ($800,000).

Justice Gavan Duffy gave his decision. The 80 Donegal fishermen won the right to fish the river. Any charters granting the rights to the Irish Society were contrary to the Magna Carta, Justice Duffy said.
